FR: CEO Mary

One Of The Largest National Corporations [OOTLNC],
Outside Sales Representative Interview:

List any reason(s) known to you why you might not be able to perform consistently and promptly any of the job duties for which you are applying.

CEO MARY: Isn't it funny that you apparently must be required by some directive somewhere to ask that question? Seriously? Right from the moment of interview, you might have to hire someone who "might not be able to perform consistently and promptly any of the job duties for which they are applying?"

Sort of like asking "If hired, can you give written evidence of your right to work in the United States?"

Well to put your mind at ease... guess what... I'm actually an American citizen. Born and raised here. In fact, you could actually call the hometown doctor that delivered me all those years ago and he would confirm... yep... she's 100 percent American, delivered by a 100 percent American OB/GYN, to a 100 percent American mom and a 100 percent American dad, in a country known as, you guessed it... America. I am as 100 percent American as it gets.

I wouldn't apply for a job with you that I couldn't perform. Why? Because it would waste my time and your time and potentially bog your business down to such an extent nothing could get done but paperwork documenting why someone somewhere, totally unrelated to our work relationship, thinks that you would need to hire someone who would be non-efficient to your company.

Golly... sounds like something a competitor would do. Probably those pesky newspaper guys wanting us to have ink all over our hands while we're eating a breakfast sandwich. But that's just me.

Personally I love driving down the road and seeing "Hey... we've got the perfect job for you" on a super whizzy lighted time-share advertising screen. I mean it's really the next best thing to God sending Gabriel to deliver that same message, without all the shock and awe or terrifying the sheep. So CEO Sean to give me a call. I can start whenever you guys get this. :-)

Why am I addressing you? Because you are the person who has the authority to make something worthwhile happen in your company. You remember right? It's Sales 101... only talk to the "decision makers". Since your company is publicly traded on the NASDAQ, maybe the decision makers just might be the shareholders... thus this publicly available interview.

I looked up the local office and realized I would not be a good fit in that space. Way too much estrogen going on there and additional drama I'm just not interested in. If you want efficient sales... broader markets without all the broads... I'm your gal. I don't do women's weekend retreats, nights out with the girls, or dream up stuff to make myself seem real on "casual Fridays". I am working for your company for one reason and one reason only... mutually maximum profits combined with mutually maximum integrity and fidelity.

If you would like to accommodate that "disability" and hire me as an independent contractor, guess what...

I can save you so much money on cubicle space, diversity training, sensitivity training, insurance health plans, and electricity just to keep the building open... you could have that many more awesome lighted billboards in the sky. You don't have to factor in sick days or days off or even any sort of scheduling whatsoever... that's just how efficient this work model can be.

Whoever put this application page together... my goodness... thank you for making me smile:

"Have you ever filed an application with OOTLNC?"

No.

"If so please provide the following:"

You do realize that if there's a red asterisk in that field and "no" is the previous answer, that field is still required? No worries. I changed the answer to yes and put the date as today.

"Have you ever been employed by OOTLNC?"

What... there's a non-application process for employment with OOTLNC?

"If so please provide the following:"

Ahh. The red asterisk puzzle again. Ok. Yes I've been employed by OOTLNC as of today, to rewrite their online application form, or just amuse those in HR and let CEO Sean know there still is intelligent life on earth.

"Are you currently employed by OOTLNC?"

Hmm. If I've ever been employed by OOTLNC, and realized I was currently working for OOTLNC now, would I be filling out an application? But technically, no... if that's what you're asking. And the answer is no for the first two questions, too... in just a face-value answer sort of questioning.

Does any of this answer your question? I mean I could redesign your whole application process, sell the ad space and actually design the ads and promotions too if you want... with no more carbon footprint than the few pixels it takes to read this conversation. I'm just that good. Remember: Desired Salary: Top Sales Rep.

Yes, but you marked "no" on "travel if job requires it".

What sort of job "requires" travel these days? I mean if I need to shake hands and influence people in person, ok... but if I'm redesigning the application process, selling the ad space and actually designing the ads and promotions too... it does seem a little counter productive to "require" me to be away from all that efficiency and productivity.

But if OOTLNC or CEO Sean needs me to scout out other regions, boldly going where no OOTLNC has gone before... ok. I'd love to negotiate those land use rights with ranch owners along interstates in Texas or renegotiate barn roofs that still sport: See Rock City.

I mean golly, CEO Sean, I'll even drive an OOTLNC racecar at the Indy 500, or negotiate OOTLNC rights when the Goodyear blimp is on its way to the Superbowl. It's good every now and then to honor the dinosaurs that gave their lives to bring us the fossil fuels we enjoy today.

Desired Salary: Top Sales Rep.

Let me know.

Warm regards,

CEO Mary

P.S. If those ladies in the local office are actually women of integrity, honor, and faithfulness, no worries. If you knew the catastrophic invasion, destruction, and dumb shebeast battle against my marriage, family, and businesses I have weathered, you might just ask CEO Sean to independently contract me and make me a regular part of the Integrity, Fidelity, and Success training at OOTLNC... One Of The Largest National Corporations.

How would you know if you're actually women of integrity, honor, and faithfulness?

If you have ever thought it perfectly ok to adulterously invade a faithful wife and mom's marriage, family, and household by consciously pursuing her husband, aka, a married man... OR... if you're actually married to a man now... that you "captured" by such untrustworthy, dishonorable, lowlife scum of the earth tactics... forcing the innocent children of that family to be shuttled back and forth between their sweetheart mom and your loathsome stupidity...

guess what. You're a dumb shebeast and are not in any way a woman of integrity, honor, and faithfulness. We will never have anything in common. Ever. You are a destructive liability that should never be accommodated under any circumstance.

CEO Sean... give me a call. I have 32 years of life, accomplishment, and faithful service to rebuild. Thanks.
